CONTENTS

EDITORIAL .............................................. 131

ST. THOMAS AND BIBLICAL CRITICISM
By Vincent McNabb, O.P. 135

WESTMINSTER CATHEDRAL
By Eric Gill 148

PRAYER
By J. R. Meagher 153

STUDIES IN THE LITERATURE
OF SHERLOCK HOLMES
By R. A. Knox 154

JUNE, 1920

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS

ST. THOMAS AND BIBLICAL CRITICISM . By Vincent McNabb, O.P.
WESTMINSTER CATHEDRAL . . . . . By Eric Gill
STUDIES IN THE LITERATURE OF SHERLOCK HOLMES . By R. A. Knox
THE ROYAL ACADEMY . . . . . By Philip Hagreen
AT THE LEICESTER GALLERIES . . . . By Philip Hagreen

London:
BURNS, OATES
& WASHBOURNE LTD.

Price One Shilling
Net
STUDIES IN THE LITERATURE OF SHERLOCK HOLMES*

If there is anything pleasant in life, it is doing what we aren’t meant to do. If there is anything pleasant in criticism, it is finding out what we aren’t meant to find out. It is the method by which we treat as significant what the author did not mean to be significant, by which we single out as essential what the author regarded as incidental. Thus, if one brings out a book on turnips, the modern scholar tries to discover from it whether the author was on good terms with his wife; if a poet writes on buttercups, every word he says may be used as evidence against him at an inquest of his views on a future existence. On this fascinating principle we delight to extort economic evidence from Aristophanes, because Aristophanes knew nothing of economics; we try to extract cryptograms from Shakespeare, because we are inwardly certain that Shakespeare never put them there; we sift and winnow the Gospel of S. Luke, in order to produce a Synoptic problem, because S. Luke, poor man, never knew the Synoptic problem to exist.

There is, however, a special fascination in applying this method to Sherlock Holmes, because it is in a sense Holmes’s own method. “It has long been an axiom of mine,” he says, “that the little things are infinitely the most important.” It might be the motto of his life’s work. And it is (is it not?), as the clergymen say, by the little things, the apparently unimportant things, that we judge of a man’s character.

If anyone objects that the study of Holmes literature is unworthy of scholarly attention, I might content myself with replying that to the scholarly mind anything is worthy of study, if that study be thorough and systematic. But I will go further, and say that at the present time we need a far closer familiarity with Sherlock’s methods. The evil that he did live after him; the good is interred with him in the Reichenbach. It is a known fact, that is, that several people contrived the dirty and deleterious habit of taking cocaine as a result of reading the books. It is equally obvious that Scotland Yard has benefited not a whit either by his satire or by his example. When Holmes, in The Mystery of the Red-headed League, discovered that certain criminals were burrowing their way into the cellars of a bank, he sat with a dark lantern in the cellar, and nabbed them quietly as they came through. But when the Houndsditch gang were found to be meditating an exactly similar design, what did the police authorities do? They sent a small detachment of constables, who battered on the door of the scene of operations at the back, shouting: “We think there is a burglary going on in here.” They were, of course, shot down, and the Home Office had to call out a whole regiment, with guns and a fire-brigade, in order to hunt down the survivors.

* This paper was written for an Oxford Society in 1910, and was originally published in The Blue Book, a magazine which is no longer procurable.

Studies in the Literature of Sherlock Holmes

Any studies in Sherlock Holmes must be, first and foremost, studies in Dr. Watson. Let us treat at once of the literary and bibliographical aspect of the question. First, as to authenticity. There are several grave inconsistencies in the Holmes cycle. For example, The Study in Scarlet and The Reminiscences are from the hand of John H. Watson, M.D., but in the story of The Man with the Twisted Lip, Mrs. Watson addresses her husband as James. “Nihil aliud hic latet,” says the great Sauvosch, “nisi redactor ignorantissimus.” Yet this error gave the original impetus to Backnecke’s theory of the deuto-ro-Watson, to whom he assigns The Study in Scarlet, The Gloria Scott, and The Return of Sherlock Holmes. He leaves to the proto-
Blackfriars

Watson the rest of the Memoirs, the Adventures, The Sign of Four, and The Hound of the Baskervilles. He disputed The Study in Scarlet on other grounds, the statement in it for example that Holmes’s knowledge of literature and philosophy was nil, whereas it is clear that the true Holmes was a man of wide reading and deep thought. We shall deal with this in its proper place.

The Gloria Scott is condemned by Backnecke partly on the ground of the statement that Holmes was only for two years at College, while he speaks in The Musgrave Ritual of “my last years” at the University, which Backnecke supposes to prove that the two stories do not come from the same hand. The Gloria Scott further represents Percy Trevor’s bulldog as having bitten Holmes on his way down to Chapel, which is clearly untrue, since dogs are not allowed within the gates at either University. “The bulldog is more at home,” he adds, “on the Chapel steps than this fraudulent imitation among the divine products of the Watsonsgenius.” A further objection to The Gloria Scott is that it exhibits only four divisions out of the eleven-fold division (to be mentioned later) of the complete Holmes-episode, a lower percentage than is found in any other genuine story. For myself, however, I am content to believe that this irregularity is due merely to the exceptional character of the investigation, while the two inaccuracies are too slight (me judice) to form the basis for so elaborate a theory. I would include both The Gloria Scott and The Study in Scarlet as genuine incidents of Holmes-biography.

When we come to the final problem, the alleged death of Holmes, and his subsequent return in an unimpaired and even vigorous condition, the problem grows darker.

Some critics, accepting The Return stories as genuine, regard The Final Problem as an incident faked by Watson for his own purposes; thus M. Piff-Pouff represents it as an old dodge of the thaumaturgist, and quotes the example of Salmois or Gebeleis among the Getae, who hid underground for two years, and then returned to preach the doctrine of immortality. In fact, M. Piff-Pouff’s verdict is thus expressed: “Sherlockholmes has not at all fallen from the Reichenbach, it is Watson who has fallen from the pinnacle of his mendacity.” In a similar vein, Bilgemann asserts that the episode is a weak imitation of Empedocles on Etna, the alpenstock being left behind to represent the famous slipper which was revomited by the volcano. “The episode of the Final Problem,” in his own immortal language, “completely the Watsonspellecart overturned has.”

Studies in the Literature of Sherlock Holmes

Others, Backnecke of course among them, regard The Final Problem as genuine, and The Return stories as a fabrication. The evidence against these stories may be divided into (a) those suggested by changes in the character and methods of Holmes, (b) those resting on impossibilities in the narrative itself, (c) inconsistencies found by comparison with the previous narrative.

(a) The true Holmes is never discourteous to a client: the Holmes of the adventure of the Three Students “shrugged his shoulders in ungracious acquiescence while our visitor . . . poured forth his story.” On the other hand, the true Holmes has no morbid craving for serious crime; but when John Hector Macfarlane talks of the probability of being arrested, the detective is represented as saying: “Arrest you! this is most gratifying—most interesting.” Twice in The Return he gies at his prisoner, a habit from which the true Holmes, whether from professional etiquette or from natural good breeding, invariably abstains. Again, the false Holmes actually calls a client by her Christian name, an impossible thing to an author whose views had not been distorted by the erroneous presentation of him in the play. He deliberately abstains from food while at work: the real Holmes only does so through absent-mindedness, as in The Case of the Five Orange Pips. He quotes Shakespeare in these stories alone, and that three times, without acknowledgment. He gives way to ludicrously bad logic in The Dancing Men. He sends Watson as his emissary in The Solitary Cyclist, and this is everywhere unparalleled, for in The Hound of the Baskervilles he himself goes down to Dartmoor as well, to watch the case incognito.
Blackfriars

(b) Is it likely that a University scholarship paper—nay, an Oxford scholarship paper, for the Quadrangle is mentioned in connexion with it—should be printed only one day before the examination? That it should consist of only half a chapter of Thucydides? That this half-chapter should take the examiner an hour and a half to correct for the press? That the proofs of the half-chapter should be in three consecutive slips? Moreover, if a pencil was marked with the name JOHANN FABER, how could the two letters NN, and these two only, be left on the stump? The Waynflete Professor of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy (Prof. J. A. Smith) has further pointed out that it would be impossible to find out from the superimposition of the tracks of front and back bicycle tyres, whether the cyclist was going or coming.

(c) As to actual inconsistencies. In The Mystery of the Solitary Cyclist a marriage is performed with no one present except the happy couple and the officiating clergyman. In The Scandal in Bohemia Holmes, disguised as a loafer, is deliberately called in to give away an unknown bride, on the ground that the marriage will not be valid without a witness. In The Final Problem, the police secure "the whole gang with the exception of Moriarty." In The Story of the Empty House we hear that they failed to incriminate Colonel Moran. Professor Moriarty, in The Return, is called Professor James Moriarty, whereas we know from The Final Problem that James was really the name of his military brother, who survived him. And, worst of all, the dummy in the Baker Street window is draped in the old mouse-colored dressing-gown! As if we had forgotten that it was in a blue dressing-gown that Holmes smoked an ounce of shag tobacco at a sitting, while he unravelled the dark complication of The Man with the Twisted Lip! The detective, says M. Papier Maché, has become a chameleon. "This is not the first time," says the more ponderous Sauwosch, "that a coat of many colours has been as a deception used! But in truth Sherlock, our modern Joseph, devoured been was, and the evil beast Watson him devoured has."

Studies in the Literature of Sherlock Holmes

To this criticism I assent. I cannot assent, however, to the theory of the deüter-Watson. I believe that all the stories were written by Watson, but whereas the genuine cycle actually happened, the spurious adventures are the lucubration of his own unaided invention. Surely we may reconstruct the facts thus. Watson has been a bit of a gadabout. He is a spendthrift: so much we know from the beginning of The Study in Scarlet. His brother, as Holmes finds out by examining the scratches on the keyhole of his watch, was a confirmed drunkard. He himself, as a bachelor, haunts the Criterion Bar. In The Sign of Four he admits having had too much Beaune for lunch, behaves strangely in the cab, speaks of firing off a double-barrelled tiger-cub at a musket, and cautions his future wife against taking more than two drops of castor-oil, while recommending strychnine in large doses as a sedative. What happens? His Elijah is taken away from him; his wife, as we know, dies: he slips back into the grip of his old enemy; his practice, already diminished by continued neglect, vanishes away; he is forced to earn a livelihood by patching together clumsy travesties of the wonderful incidents of which he was once the faithful recorder.

Sauwoesch has even worked out an elaborate table of his debts to other authors, and to the earlier stories. Holmes's stay in Tibet with the Grand Llama is due to Dr. Nikola; the cipher of the dancing-men is read in the same manner as that in The Gold Bug, by Edgar Allen Poe; The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton shows the influence of Raffles. The Norwood Builder owes much to The Scandal in Bohemia; The Solitary Cyclist has the plot of The Greek Interpreter; The Six Napoleons of The Blue Carbuncle; The Adventure of the Second Stain is a doublet of The Naval Treaty, and so on.

We now pass on to the dating of the various pieces, so far as it can be determined by internal evidence, implicit or explicit. The results may be tabulated thus:

1. The Gloria Scott—Holmes's first case.
2. The Musgrave Ritual—his second.
3. The Study in Scarlet—Watson first appears, i.e. the first of the We-Stories. Date 1879.
4. The Resident Patient (1880).
5. The Speckled Band (1883).
6. The Reigate Squires (April, 1887).
7. The Five Orange Pips (same year).
8. The Sign of Four (1888)—Watson becomes engaged.
9. The Noble Bachelor. Then comes Watson's marriage, followed closely by
10. The Crooked Man.
11. The Scandal in Bohemia, and
12. The Naval Treaty, apparently in that order.

To some period in the year 1888 we must assign 13, 14, and 15, that is The Stockbroker's Clerk, The Case of Identity, and The Red-headed League. In the June of 1889 we have (16) The Man with the Twisted Lip, (17) The twenty-three short stories—twelve in the Adventures and eleven in the Memoirs—we may proceed to examine the construction and the literary antecedents of this form of Art. The actual scheme of each should consist, according to the German scholar Ratzegger, followed by most of his successors, of eleven distinct parts; the order of them may in some cases be changed about, and more or less of them may appear as the story is closer to or farther from the ideal type. Only The Study in Scarlet exhibits all the eleven; The Sign of Four and Silver Blaze have ten; The Boscombe Valley Mystery and The Beryl Coronet nine; The Hound of the Baskervilles, The Speckled Band, The Reigate Squire, and The Naval Treaty eight; and so on till we reach The Five Orange Pips, The Crooked Man, and The Final Problem with five, and The Gloria Scott with only four.
Blackfriars

The first part is the Prooimion, a homely Baker Street scene, with invaluable personal touches, and sometimes a demonstration by the detective. Then follows the first explanation, or Exegesis (κατὰ τὸν φεύγωντα), that is, the client’s statement of the case, followed by the Ichneusis, or personal investigation, often including the famous floor-walk on hands and knees. No. 1 is invariable, Nos. 2 and 3 almost always present, Nos. 4, 5, and 6 are less necessary; they include the Anasceue, or refutation on its own merits of the official theory of Scotland Yard, the first Pro- menesis (exoterice) which gives a few stray hints to the police, which they never adopt, and the second Promenesis (esoterice), which adumbrates the true course of the investigation to Watson alone. This is sometimes wrong, as in The Yellow Face. No. 7 is the Exetasis, or further following up of the trail, including the cross-questioning of relatives, dependents, etc., of the corpse (if there is one), visits to the Record Office, and various investigations in an assumed character.

Studies in the Literature of Sherlock Holmes

No. 8 is the Anagorisis, in which the criminal is caught or exposed; No. 9 the second Exegesis (κατὰ τὸν φεύγωντα), that is to say the criminal’s confession; No. 10 the Metamenesis, in which Holmes describes what his clues were and how he followed them; and No. 11 the Epilogos, sometimes comprised in a single sentence. This conclusion is, like the Prooimion, invariable, and often contains a gnome or quotation from some standard author.

Although The Study in Scarlet is in a certain sense the type and ideal of a Holmes story, it is also to some extent a primitive type, of which elements were later discarded. The Exegesis (κατὰ τὸν φεύγωντα) is told for the most part, not in the words of the criminal, but as a separate story in the mouth of the narrator; it also occupies a disproportionate amount of the total space. This shows directly the influence of Gaboriau: his Detective’s Dilemma is one volume, containing an account of the tracing of the crime back to its author, who is, of course, a duke; the second volume, The Detective’s Triumph, is almost entirely a retailing of the duke’s family history, dating back to the Revolution, and we only rejoin Lecoq, the detective, in the last chapter. Of course this method of telling the story was found long and cumbrous, but the French school has not yet seen through it, since The Mystery of the Yellow Room leaves a whole unexplained problem to provide copy for The Perfume of the Lady in Black.

But the literary affinities of Dr. Watson’s masterly style are to be looked for further afield than Gaboriau, or Poe, or Wilkie Collins. M. Piff-Pouff, especially in his Psychologie de Vatson, has instituted some very remarkable parallels with the Dialogues of Plato, and with the Greek drama. He reminds us of the bustling manner of Thrasymachus when he first breaks into the argument of the Republic, and compares the entry of Athene Jones: “Oh, come, now, come!
Blackfriars

Never be ashamed to own up! But what's all this? Bad business, bad business! Stern facts here, no room for theories,” and so on. And when the detective comes back crestfallen after a few days, wiping his brow with a red handkerchief, we remember how Socrates describes the first time in his life when he ever saw Thrasymachus blushing. The rival theories of Gregson and Lestrade only serve to illustrate the multifor-mity of error—ἐσθολοι μὲν γὰρ ἀπλοὶς, παντοδαπῶς ἐκ κακοὶ. But the most important point is the nature of the Scotland Yard criticism. Lecoq has his rival, but the rival is his own superior in the detective force, thwarts his schemes out of pique, and actually convinces at the prisoner’s receiving notes through the window of his cell.

If the Sophists have been borrowed from the Platonic dialogue, one element at least has been borrowed from the Greek drama. Gaboriau has no Watson. The confidant of Lecoq is an old soldier, preternaturally stupid, inconceivably inefficient. Watson provides what the Holmes drama needs—a Chorus. He represents the solid, orthodox, respectable view of the world in general; his drabness is accentuated by contrast with the limelight which beats upon the central figure. He remains stable amid the eddy and flux of circumstance.

Ille bonis faveatque, et consilieturn amice,
Et regat iratos, et amet peccare timentes:
Ille dapes laudet mensae brevis, ille salubrem
Justitiam, legesque, et apertis utia portis.
Ille regat comissa, deosque precetur et oret
Ut redat miseris, abeat fortuna superbis.

It is to Prof. Sabagione that we owe the profoundest study of Watson in this, his choric character. He compares such passages as that in The Speckled Band:

"Holmes.—The lady could not move her bed. It must always be in the same relative position to the ventilator and the rope—for such we may call it, since it was clearly never meant for a bell-pull.

"Watson.—Holmes, I seem to see what you are hitting at. We are only just in time to prevent some subtle and horrible crime," with the well-known passage in the Agamemnon:

"Cassandra.—Ah, ah, keep away the bull from the cow! She takes him, the black-horned one, in a net by her device, and smites him: he falls in a watery vessel. I speak to thee of the Mystery of the Treacherous Cauldron.

"Chorus.—Far be it from me to boast of any particular skill in oracles, but I deduce from these words some impending evil."

Watson, like the Chorus, is ever in touch with the main action, and seems to share the full privileges of the audience; yet, like the Chorus, he is always about three stages behind the audience in the unravelling of the plot.

And the seal, and symbol, and secret of Watson is, of course, his bowler. It is not like other bowlers: it is a priestly vestment, an insigne of office. Holmes may wear a squash hat, but Watson cleaves to his bowler, even at midnight in the silence of Dartmoor, or on the solitary slopes of the Reichenbach. He wears it constantly, even as the archimandrite or the rabbi wears his hat: to remove it would be akin to the shearing of Samson’s locks by Delilah. “Watson and his bowler,” says M. Piff-Pouff, “they are separable only in thought.” It is his apex of wool, his petasus of invisibility, his mitra pretiosa, his triple tiara, his halo. The bowler stands for all that is immutable and impeccable, for law and justice, for the established order of things, for the rights of humanity, for the triumph of the man over the brute. It towers colossal over sordidness and misery and crime: it shames and heals and hallows. The curve of its brim is the curve of perfect symmetry, the rotundity of its crown is the rotundity of the world. "From the hats of Holmes's clients," writes Prof. Sabagione, "deduce themselves the traits, the habits, the idiosyncrasies: from the hat of Guatson deduces itself his character." Watson is everything to Holmes—his medical adviser, his foil, his philosopher, his confidant, his sympathizer, his biographer, his domestic chaplain, but above all things else he stands exalted in history as the wearer of the unconquerable bowler hat.

And if the rival detectives are the Sophists, and Watson is the Chorus, what of the clients, and what of the criminals? It is most important to remember that these are only secondary figures. "The murderers of the Holmes cycle," M. Papier Maché assures us, "are of no more importance than the murderers are not in Macbeth." Holmes himself often deprecates Watson's habit of making the stories too sensational, but he does him an injustice. The authors of crime are not, in Watson, of personal interest, like the Duke in Gaboriau; they have no relation to the detective other than that which subsists between the sleuthhound and its quarry—the author of The Mystery of the Yellow Room was a bungler when he made Jacques Rouletabille the criminal's natural son—they are not animated by lofty or religious motives like the high-flown villains in Mr. Chesterton's Innocence of Father Brown. All clients are model clients—they state their case in flawless journalese; all criminals are model criminals—they do the cleverest thing a criminal could possibly do in the given circumstances. By a sort of Socratic paradox, we might say that the best detective can only catch the best thief. A single blunder on the part of the guilty man would have thrown all Holmes's deductions out of joint. Love and money are their only incentives: brutality and cunning their indefeasible qualities.

And thus we arrive at the central figure himself, and must try to gather together a few threads in the complex and many-sided character. There is an irony in the process, for Holmes liked to look upon himself as a machine, an inhuman and undifferentiated sleuthhound. "L'homme, ce n'est rien; l'œuvre, c'est tout," was one of his favourite quotations.

Sherlock Holmes was descended from a long line of country squires: his grandmother was the sister of a French artist: his elder brother Mycroft was, as we all know, more gifted than himself, but found an occupation, if the Reminiscences are to be trusted, in a confidential audit of Government accounts. Of Sherlock's school career we know nothing; Watson was at school, and one of his schoolmates was the nephew of a peer, but this seems to have been exceptional there, since it was considered good fun to "chevy him about the playground and hit him over the shins with a wicket." This seems to dispose of the idea that Watson was an Etonian. On the other hand, we have no evidence as to his University career, except the testimony (always doubtful) of one of the Return stories that he was unacquainted with the scenery of Cambridgeshire. Of Holmes's student days our knowledge is much fuller: he was reserved by nature, and his recreations—boxing and fencing—did not make him many acquaintances. One of his friends was Percy Trevor, son of an ex-convict who had made his money in the Australian goldfields; another, Reginald Musgrave, whose ancestors went back to the Conquest—quite the last word in aristocracy. He lived in a College, but what College? And at which University? The argument that his scientific bent would have naturally taken him to Cambridge defeats itself, for why should he have been only up two years, if he wanted a proper scientific training? More and more as I consider the wealth of his two friends, the exclusive aristocracy of the one, and the doggy tendencies of the other, together with the isolation which put even so brilliant a light as Holmes’s under a bushel—more and more I incline to the opinion that he was up at the House. But we have no sure evidence.
Blackfriars

If he was an Oxford man, he was not a Greats’ man. Yet when Watson describes his first impressions of the man at the beginning of The Study in Scarlet—the locus classicus for Holmes’s characteristics—he wrongs him in saying that his knowledge of philosophy is nil, and his knowledge of literature nil. The fact is, clearly, that Holmes did not let his talents appear till he had been living with Watson for some time, and had come to recognize his sterling qualities. In fact, he compares Hafiz with Horace, quotes Tacitus, Jean Paul, Flaubert, Goethe, and Thoreau, and reads Petrarch in a G.W.R. carriage. He has no interest in philosophy as such, yet he holds certain definite views on scientific method. A philosopher could not have said, “When you have eliminated the impossible, whatever remains, however improbable, must be the truth.” He could not have confused observation with inference, as Holmes does when he says: “Observation shows me you have been to the Post Office,” judging by the mud on Watson’s boots. There must be inference here, though it may be called implicit inference, however rapid be the transition of thought. Yet Holmes was no sensationalist. What subtler confession of faith could any realist make than the remark in The Study in Scarlet: “I ought to know by this time that when a fact appears to be opposed to a long train of deductions, it invariably proves to be capable of bearing some other interpretation?”

And here I must say a word on the so-called “method of deduction.” M. Papier Maché has boldly asserted that it was stolen from Gaboriau. M. Piff-Pouff in his well-known article, “Qu’est que c’est que la déduction?” declares roundly that Holmes’s methods were inductive. The two fallacies rest on a common ground. Lecoq has observation: he notices footsteps on the snow. He has powers of inference, for he can infer from such footsteps the behaviour of those who have left them. He has not the method of deduction: he never sits down and reasons out what it is probable the man would have done next. Lecoq has his lens and his forceps; he has not the dressing-gown and the pipe. That is why he has to depend on mere chance, again and again, for picking up lost threads. Holmes no more depended on a chance than he prayed for a miracle. That is why Lecoq, baffled after a long investigation, has to have recourse to a sort of arm-chair detective, who, without leaving the arm-chair, tells him exactly what must have happened. It is wrong to call this latter character, as M. Papier Maché does, the original of Mycroft: he is the original, if you will, of Sherlock. Lecoq is but the Stanley Hopkins, almost the Lestrade, of his period. Holmes himself has explained for us the difference between observation (or inference) and deduction. It is by observation a posteriori that he recognizes Watson’s visit to the Post Office from the mud on his trousers: it is by deduction a priori that he knows he has been sending a telegram, since he has seen plenty of stamps and postcards in Watson’s desk.

Let us now take two pictures of Sherlock Holmes—the one at leisure, the other at work. Leisure was, of course, abhorrent to him—more so than to Watson. Watson says he was reckoned fleet of foot, but we have only his own word for it, and Holmes always beat him; beyond this alleged prowess we have no evidence of Watson’s athleticism, except that he could throw a rocket through a first-floor window—no exceptional feat, if Prof. Sabagione is right in saying that he was up at New College. But Holmes had been a boxer and a fencer; during periods of enforced inactivity he fired a revolver at the opposite wall till he had "marked it with the patriotic device 'V.R.'" Violin-playing occupied leisure moments when Watson first knew him, but later it seems to be nothing more than a relaxation after hard work. And—this is very important—in this music was the exact antithesis of cocaine. We never hear of the drug being used in order to stimulate the mental faculties for hard work. All the stimulus needed he derived from tobacco. We all know, of course, that he smoked shag; few people could say offhand what his pipe was made of. As a matter of fact, his tastes were various. The long vigil in Neville St. Clair's house was solaced by a briar—this is when he is hard at work; when he sees his way through a problem by inspection, as in The Case of Identity, he takes down "the old and oily clay pipe, which was to him as a counsellor." In The Copper Beeches he takes down "the long cherrywood pipe with which he was wont to replace his clay when he was in a disputative rather than a meditative mood." On one occasion he offers Watson snuff. Watson, by the way, smoked ship's tobacco when he went into lodgings with Holmes, but must have replaced it soon after with a sterner stuff, thinly veiled under the nom de plume of Arcadia mixture. This expensive product he did not abandon even under the exigencies of married life, though his circumstances were not those of affluence, since he had linoleum laid down in the front hall. But the pipe is not to Watson what it is to Holmes. To Holmes belongs the immortal phrase: "This will be a three-pipe problem." He is one of the world's great smokers.
Blackfriars

Now let us see Holmes at work. We all know how brisk he becomes at the appearance of a client; how, that he is examining the window-frame for scratches. At another moment he is purchasing "something a little choice in white wines," and discoursing on miracle plays, on Stradivarius violins, on the Buddhism of Ceylon, and on the warships of the future.

But there are two specially human characteristics which come out at the very moment of action. One is a taste for theatrical arrangement, as when he sends back five orange pips to the murderers of John Openshaw, or takes a sponge into prison with which to unmask the man with the twisted lip, or serves up the Naval Treaty under a cover as a breakfast-dish. The other is a taste for epigram. When he gets a letter from a duke, he says: "It looks like one of those social summonses which call upon a man either to be bored or to lie." There is a special kind of epigram, known as the Sherlockismus, of which the indefatigable Ratzegger has collected no less than 173 instances. The following may serve as examples:

"Let me call your attention to the curious incident of the dog in the night-time."

"The dog did nothing at all in the night-time."

"That was the curious incident," said Sherlock Holmes.

And again:

"I was following you, of course."

"Following me? I saw nobody."

"That is what you must expect to see when I am following you," said Sherlock Holmes.

To write fully on the subject of this paper would need two terms' lectures at least. Some time, when leisure is given, and the College is more enterprising, I hope to deliver them. Meanwhile, I have thrown out these hints, drawn these outlines of a possible mode of treatment. You know my methods, Watson: apply them.

R. A. KNOX.

THE SONG OF DEBORAH
(continued)

THE Song of Deborah is, then, commonly judged—and on good grounds—to be contemporary with the event which it celebrates. At moments of intense feeling, poetry not too burdened by rules, far from being an artificial, is, on the contrary, a most natural form of expression; certainly at such times it comes readily to the lips of spontaneous peoples such as the Semites. As the occasion, so is the form; David's grief, for example, over the death of Saul and Jonathan produces his poetical lament as given in 2 Samuel i. 19 ff. A most interesting parallel to the occasion and form of the Song of Deborah is provided by an incident which occurred only some thirty years ago at Madaba, a village a few miles east of the Dead Sea. The Arab tribe of the 'Azeizāt which had settled at Madaba was attacked by another Arab tribe, the Beni Sakher. The 'Azeizāt had hardly succeeded in repelling the attack before their women had composed odes to honour those who had braved, and to stigmatize those who had shirked, the perils of the fight.*

It is something of that kind that we have here. It is not an epic poem depicting the exploits of bygone heroes, nor simply a song of thanksgiving for some former striking divine intervention. The poet praises and blames, blesses and curses, and he does so because the objects of his blessings and of his cursings are there before him acting on him; he sings because he must. Anger against the recreants who shirked the peril, the going out of his heart and soul to those who braved death for the common cause, and above all to Yahweh, the life of that cause—these emotions are still fresh and warm in the poem. In its way it does for an incident in the life of an obscure people in the first half